Cincinnati Bell retail tour highlights

BY ANNA GIBSON

Cincinnati Bell recently hosted RFC's Alternate Channel Fall Workshop. Representatives from seven telcos attended in addition to two vendor companies. Discussions were held on a variety of topics including: door to door sales, MDU, aggregators, outbound telemarketing, big box, resellers, social networking, tech/employee referral programs and e-commerce. This was a great opportunity to share best practices and I am confident that every participant came away with new, creative ideas.

One highlight of the workshop was a tour of Cincinnati Bell's flagship retail store. It is unlike any retail store that I have visited in the industry. It is spacious and very attractive, resembling an Apple store with more color and pizzazz. When you walk into the store you first see a podium-type kiosk that houses an electronic sign-in. From there, the center of the store is an S-like configuration of equipment displays. Sales people are readily available to assist customers. Across the store is a living area that includes all of the home related products. On the other side of the sales floor is a wall completely covered by accessories for sale.

One of the unique aspects of this store is an area in the back quadrant specifically for small business customers. There is a conference table, display of multi-line equipment and a coffee bar for refreshments. This is intended to be an area that customers and representatives can discuss business related needs in a more business-like environment. In addition, a state of the art conference center housing video conferencing equipment is available for small businesses to rent. This allows a small or home-based business to do business in the same fashion as a larger competitor.

If you've seen an Apple store then you know about the Genius Bar, primarily utilized for repair and technical support. The Cincinnati store has its own Genius Bar. As with Apple, it is in the back of the store and is a counter with stools. In addition to repair and technical support, they also provide billing and payment support.

Should you ever be in the Cincinnati area, I would urge you to take a look. All in all, the store is a one stop shop for customers in an environment that is extremely pleasant and conducive to sales. Our sincere thanks go out to Ron Sweeney and his team for this fabulous tour.

If you'd like more information, the Director-Owned Retail is Dennis Maguire, 513-703-1837.
